Potential for Appreciation

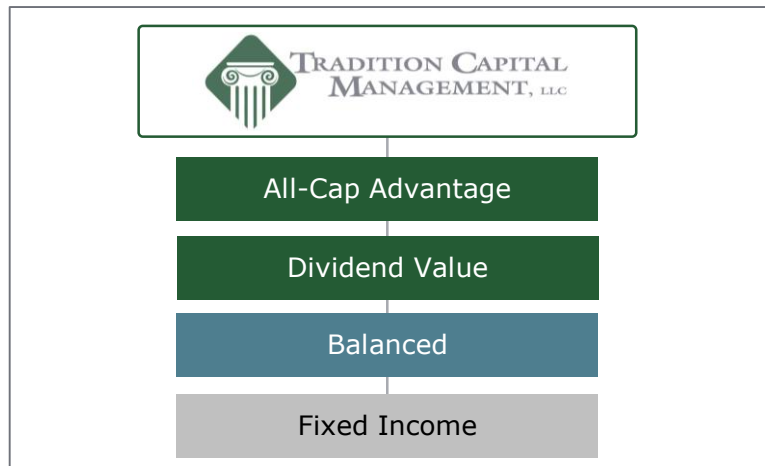

- A portfolio of well-researched, high-quality companies selling below intrinsic value can potentially offer attractive returns that capture the market’s appreciation potential while also providing protection during harsh bear market corrections
- Upside capture compares an investment’s performance against its benchmark during periods when the market index’s returns are positive, while downside capture compares performance against the benchmark when its results are negative.

12/31/2000 – 12/31/2018. Upside capture ratio greater than 100 has outperformed the index during up-market periods; downside capture ratio of less than 100 has outperformed the index in down market periods.
